The annual budget of the federal government is a significant portion of the national economy. The budget process involves several key steps, including submission of agency budgets, Senate and House appropriations, and final approval by Congress. The budget is typically presented in two forms: the budget in brief and the detailed budget. The budget in brief provides a summary of the budget's key elements, while the detailed budget outlines the specific programs and activities funded by the government. The budget process is closely monitored by Congress, the media, and the public, as it impacts federal spending and policy priorities.
On Predicting Upset Losses from Fretted Depths

1 Introduction

2 Description

3.1 Predictive model for upset losses

4 Summary

5 Literature Review

6 Conclusion

7 Appendix

Figure 1. Schematic diagram of upset losses from fretted depths.